

Clarence Brown: Hollywood's Forgotten Master of Screen Classics

Clarence Brown was one of the most successful directors in Hollywood history, directing over 80 films and winning three Academy Awards. He is best known for his work on such classic films as The Devil and Miss Jones (1941), National Velvet (1944), and Intruder in the Dust (1949). However, despite his success, Brown is often overlooked by film historians and critics. This book aims to rectify that by exploring Brown's life and work, and arguing that he is one of the most important and influential directors of all time.

Early Life and Career

Clarence Brown was born in Clinton, Massachusetts, in 1890. He began his career in the film industry as a cameraman, and later worked as an assistant director. In 1914, he directed his first film, The Great Ruby. Over the next few years, Brown directed a number of successful films, including

The Goose Woman (1915), The Eternal City (1915), and The Light in the Dark (1917).

The Golden Age of Hollywood

In the 1920s, Brown's career reached its peak. He directed a number of classic films, including Smilin' Through (1922), The Eagle (1925), and Anna Christie (1923). Brown's films were known for their lush visuals, romantic atmosphere, and strong performances. He was also one of the first directors to use sound effectively in his films.

Later Career

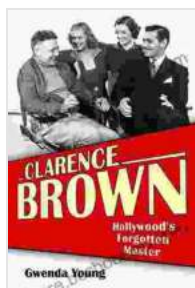

In the 1930s and 1940s, Brown continued to direct successful films, including The Devil and Miss Jones (1941), National Velvet (1944), and Intruder in the Dust (1949). However, his career began to decline in the 1950s, as he struggled to adapt to the changing tastes of audiences. Brown's last film was The Favor (1956), after which he retired from directing.
