Henry VII's son, Henry VIII, was a very different character. He was a charismatic and flamboyant king, and he presided over a period of great cultural and political change. Henry VIII was also a ruthless and capricious tyrant, and he is best known for his six wives. He divorced two of them, and had two of them executed.

Anne Boleyn was Henry VIII's second wife. She was a beautiful and intelligent woman, and she quickly became one of the most powerful women in England. However, her relationship with Henry was doomed from the start. Henry was obsessed with producing a male heir, and Anne failed to give him one. In 1536, she was executed on trumped-up charges of treason.
