In this inspiring and thought-provoking book, historian and political commentator David Barton explores what the Founding Fathers would say to America today. Drawing on their writings, speeches, and actions, Barton reveals their timeless wisdom and insights on the principles that made America great.

Barton argues that the Founders were not perfect men, but they were deeply committed to the principles of liberty, equality, and self-government. They believed that America was a unique experiment in human history, and they were determined to create a nation that would be a beacon of hope for the world.

Today, America is facing many of the same challenges that the Founders faced. We are divided by political ideology, racial tensions, and economic inequality. But Barton believes that the Founders' wisdom can still guide us today. He argues that we need to return to the principles that made America great: limited government, individual liberty, and free markets.

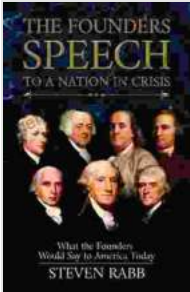

Barton's book is a timely and important reminder of the values that have made America a great nation. It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the history of America and its future.

What the Founders Would Say About:

- The role of government
- The importance of individual liberty
- The necessity of a free market economy
- The importance of education
- The role of religion in society
- The importance of national unity

In this book, Barton provides a wealth of historical evidence to support his arguments. He shows that the Founders were men of deep faith who believed that America was a nation with a special destiny. They were also men of great courage and determination who were willing to fight for their beliefs.

Barton's book is a timely and important reminder of the values that have made America a great nation. It is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the history of America and its future.
